Hello everyone, I hope you all's day is going well. In my video I decided to do a culturally relevant classroom presentation generated on teaching the students. here is the class description...Hope everyone enjoy the video. All feedback is welcome :-)

Scenario

In one month, my ESL students will be graduating from High School. Over the course of the final month the students have been covering present and future tense verb actions, while also presenting ideas of their post high school goals and ideas. Now it is time to reflect on the past. Through the use of a cultural consciousness music video, students will reflect on their cultural upbringing and sharpen their usage of past and present tense in reading, listening, and verbal linguistics describing a person or place.

Hi Monta!

I liked that you asked your students questions and solicited feedback throughout your lesson. I also think you did a great job giving directions and validating student responses by writing them down.

Hi Monta

It is good to ask students to recall their learning experience in high school at the beginning, for their memories must be fresh and highly relevant to them. You're also right to limit the memory to last week. As usual, you're friendly to your students and they must like you a lot.

However, your students are already Grade 12. Don't you think teaching regular past verbs to them will be a bit too simple to them. In addition, there is no need to tell your students what you are going to teach. You could have instead written your lesson plan or objectives on the whiteboard or simple led them into the lesson objectives through the music video. By the way, could I have access to the video like its YouTube video link?

As far as the background of the music video is concerned, you could have introduced the background before the video. Also, as you're teaching an ESL class whose students are probably from different parts of the world including Asia, Europe, and Africa, you might've given them more support if they've been in the States not for a long time. I know some young Chinese students studying for 3 years in LA middle school. But they're still not familiar with mainstream American culture.

Hope my humble advice will help.

Hi Monta, I finally was able to see your presentation and I loved how low key calm you were. I honestly looked to your video for guidance because I was having a hard time with mine. Thanks for posting. I also liked how you took the time to observe the imaginary students off camera. That gave me an idea that maybe I should do that to center myself. Everyone is looking to the teacher for guidance and it's important for the teacher to remain present.

Hi Luis! I liked that your lesson was clear and interactive. For assignment #2, that really struck a chord with me. Arguing for English to be the official language of the United States was something I remember hearing back in a classroom. Somebody said that English should be the universal language of the world. A non-white person said this. So it surprised me when the white students found that statement to be belittling. This made me think about how much we progressed in an American society and how we recognize other people's backgrounds.

Hi Erica. Your video and presentation is very polished. I was immediately invested in what you had to say. Your tone of voice is inviting and your visuals hold the viewers attention. What stood out to me is that you emphasize through your considerations to the curriculum, classroom, and support that your students are individuals and as you said, more than just their grades. Here are some of the suggestions you made for curriculum, classroom, and support that I hope to implement in my classroom: Having varying methods of teaching and multiple opportunities to demonstrate their understanding of the material, arranging the classroom in such a way to disrupt the traditional power dynamic of a teacher led classroom by making the students the focus. And also providing resources for students because students are whole human beings who may need assistance or guidance along the way.

Hi Erica

How thoughtful! Your culturally inclusive classroom includes a wide variety of cultural elements.

I believe that your community college has teachers, admin staff, and students from different countries and of different backgrounds. Your college should have built networks with external parties like some LGBT groups and other local and overseas communities. Why not invite them to share their cultural experiences on Zoom or in flesh? The college or you could also run excursions visiting different cultural groups. Or teachers of different cultural backgrounds can teach other classes on regular occasions, say once every semester.

Certainly it is subject to college policy. My humble advice.

Hi Gabriela,

Your use of visuals was great! It made the presentation engaging and easy to follow. I also really liked the question you asked about leaving who you are at the door. It was a great way to make real the unrealistic expectation that students can ignore or suppress who they are. Instead, it is better that we learn about them, understand them, and support them.

I found your presentation to be really informative. I had a professor who once said "we spend a lot of time as students, so therefore, we teach the way that we are taught." I find his words to be true. I think that it is great that you have teachers reflect on their time as a students since it, in turn, can reflect on their teaching as well. Hi Michelle,

This was so good! Your lesson is organized, thorough, and follows a logical progression of skills. You are well spoken, your voice is clear and soothing. I especially like that you model various classroom arrangements as well as provide concrete examples of what culturally responsive classrooms can look like. To be honest, I had to watch this a few times to find a "grow" recommendation for you. I personally love feedback and I imagine you do too. Being extra picky, I think your two categories feel a little out of balance as you spend a lot of time on the arrangement portion and a bit less on the methodology portion, but I think the methodology is often the harder part of creating a culturally responsive classroom. More than something to change, I think I would just recommend adding on in terms of a concrete activity or way for teachers to improve student-teacher interactions. I think most teachers know how to maintain the authoritative role of a teacher, but many struggle to find creative ways to engage on a more personal level with their students to build rapport. Maybe you could model a game or activity that allows for students to share something about themselves or puts the teacher on the student level. But again, I am just being really picky at this point :)

Thank you for sharing!

Geronima

Hi Caitlin, I liked how you are typing your points as you are giving a lesson, and also how you switch to small webcam of yourself and a full-screen of yourself when it's needed. It definitely catches the attention. Also you are asking many questions to your students and I appreciate that. And the tone of voice you have is very relaxing in a good way. It doesn't come as harsh or too much for your audience to hear!

Hi Caitlin,

I enjoyed your opening activity. The prompt was universal and would create some pretty engaging conversation. Considering the various cultures we belong to allows us to connect our personal lives to what is being learned, which is exactly what we are trying to do for our students when building community and bridging diverse backgrounds. I like all the parts of your lesson. For instance, looking at the classroom pictures was a great way to make the content more concrete and the video you showed was rich with information and visuals. My suggestion would be to reorganize the order of the lesson a little bit, specifically the video and the review of the images. If your participants know the content first, then they have more direction when looking at the pictures. They might be able to make more connections to the video independently or within small groups.

Thank you for sharing!

Geronima

Hello Grace:

Thank you for your video! It is cool and so cute! The hook is especially amazing...I mean, when I see your cover, I immediately want to click inside and have a look!

I also want to learn how to put your face at the corner when you are showing the screen...

Thank you for your hard work!

Hello everyone, here is my presentation. I don't have that much teaching experience like many of you guys have, but I tried my best to put together my thoughts as if I'm really giving a lesson in front of a group of educators. Maybe that's I sound so nervous and unnatural, but trust me I do not sound this stiff in real life. Thank you for viewing my presentation lesson!
